

Paul,

I run my Subway business out of my home office. It is both convenient and cost effective. But it would not be possible without DTT surveillance systems in both my stores. The cameras are up on multiple computers in my house at all times--and my employees know it. Thankfully, I have yet to have a problem with theft (maybe because of the "eye in the sky"), but cameras help me catch much more common place things: an employee not wearing a hat or apron, a messy front line, an employee taking too long of a lunch break. In short, the cameras go a long way toward maintaining a professional atmosphere, which is imperative to operating profitable stores.

Sincerely,

PS. I am opening a third store this summer and plan to have a DTT system running in it from day one!
